public affairs he will have to consider as a member of the Legislative Council.

Neither of the proposers of the respective candidates touched even remotely on politics, but confined themselves solely to the personal recommendations of the two gentlemen. From the Chairman, however, we had a political speech, and a rather remarkable onc. He tells us that the less is greater than the whole, in other words, that the to hand affairs of individual firms are of greater magnitude than the affairs of the Colony, which includes many firms. We have heard the same_remark made by the Hon. P. Rygis in the Council Chamber. If what meant is that the turn-over-of-some individual firms is greater than the revenue and expenditure of the Colonial Government, that is not saying a very great deal. But finance is only one of the branches of government. There is the making of laws for the maintenance of peace and order, and commercial laws such as those governing bankruptcy, bills of sale, emigration, and the like; there is the management of the public lands; and, in short, on a wise policy of government must largely depend the development and progress of the Colony. From no point of view, therefore, can it be correct to say that the affairs of any individual firm in the Colony are of greater magnitude than those of the whole Colony. Another point touched upon by Mr. MACKINTOSH on which we cannot agree with him relates to the obligation official members of Council-are under to support the Government. Mr. MACKINTOSH asks that freedom should be given to official 123 members of Council to vote according to the dictates of their own conscience. Since the comparison between mercantile firms and the Government has been introduced, it may be asked whether any mercantile firm would allow its junior partners or assistants to conduct its affairs according to the dictates of their own conscience if those dictates were opposed to the policy of the firm. It is impossible for any Government to exist unless lative Assembly. In England and those Colonies which possess representative Goare well able to compete in quality with vernment, when the Government ceases to command a majority it resigns. In a Crown The purset ingredients only are used, and Colony things are different, and it would be anything but desirable that the Governor should be perpetually exposed to defeat b the votes of his subordinates. Nor does the Empire by Russian authorities recken it at our Customers who prefer to have them to system necessarily do violence to the consciences of the official members. There are
